About Us

The Wharton Research Advisory Group is a national forum for senior-level corporate leaders to examine the strategic human resources (HR) and labor relations issues affecting companies and their workforces. Through three annual closed-door meetings, members interact with leading government, legal, and corporate experts, analyze national and global trends, compare experiences, and tackle compliance issues.

Research Advisory Group members benefit from:

- Perspectives from current and former government officials, including members of Congress, cabinet officials, NLRB members, and EEOC commissioners
- Thought leadership and research from leading HR academics
- Cutting-edge legal analysis and risk mitigation strategies from a firm with one of the nation's leading labor and employment practices, Morgan Lewis
- Networking and benchmarking opportunities with high-level Fortune 500 executives
- Access to regular reports on strategic HR, labor-management relations, HR research and trends, legal and legislative developments, and global employment trends

Connecting senior executives with leading authorities on human resources and employee relations interact & strategize

“I’ve been a member of the Research Advisory Group for over ten years with two companies. The Research Advisory Group experience gives me access to leading edge HR strategic information and helps me keep current on HR trends and best practices in an efficient way.”

Darrell Debenham

Senior Vice President of Human Resources,
Asahi Kasei America

About the Wharton Center for Human Resources

The Wharton School's Center for Human Resources fosters interaction between academics and practitioners who specialize in HR. Through this partnership, Wharton faculty share the latest research with leading corporate HR and labor relations executives. Through its Research Advisory Group and Financial Services Group, the Center creates opportunities for corporate executives to access current thinking on talent management, labor relations, workforce training and education, and diversity, as well as to network with fellow executives from global employers.
